NAOMI KLEIN CRITICISES INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS OVER CLIMATE INTERVENTIONS

Naomi Klein delivered a stinging rebuke to Australia's approach refugees and climate change, as well as criticising interventions from the Institute of Public Affairs, in a fiery episode of ABC's Q&A on Monday night. The Canadian journalist, author and winner of the 2016 Sydney peace prize appeared on the panel alongside two panellists from the free-market thinktank the IPA, Anthony Albanese and writer Don Watson. A dispute on climate change policy was provoked by a question from audience member Jim Sandford, an economist with the leftwing thinktank the Australia Institute. Sandford asked James Paterson, a Liberal senator and former deputy executive director of the IPA: "When will your government accept once and for all the energy system has to change and start to lead that change rather than standing in the way of it?" Paterson responded by saying he thought Australia should "take an agnostic approach to energy sources". Klein interrupted Paterson and asked, "Do you believe climate change is real?" to which Paterson said he did. Klein continued: "How can you be agnostic about which energy source you use if you believe in that?" She continued, laying into the IPA itself: "I asked you if you believe in climate change and I asked you that because you've been associated with IPA. We have two people from this thinktank and this is the foremost organ in Australia for spreading climate change denial and doubt. You may personally not agree with that but the IPA publishes discredited climate change deniers, this year, in your facts book, and this is slowing us down." Georgina Downer, an adjunct fellow at the IPA, responded, saying: "The IPA is absolutely committed to research and discussion of the facts." She then went on to question how settled the science of climate change is. Downer said: "The IPA is, we don't have an IPA opinion on climate change per se. We have a committed line of research into the facts." But Klein, who has written widely on the role of free-market thinktanks and neoliberalism in stopping the world acting on climate change said: "The reason why that free markets thinktanks like IPA are so determined to raise questions, raise doubts about this issue where there is overwhelming scientific consensus that climate change is real ... If it is true, your whole world view collapses. This whole idea of pushing deregulation and privatisation and 'government get out of the way' falls apart because we need to manage this decline." Klein said Australia was virtually alone in its inaction on climate change. "Among wealthy industrialised countries, Australia now stands alone raising the middle finger to the world and saying that we're not going to act and we will build massive new coalmines, huge natural gas pipelines in the Northern Territory, opening up vast fracking fields. These are carbon bombs. This is unburnable carbon. If we're going to live up to the sacred promise we made in Paris, to countries like your home country." She said the public "have to stand up to the extraordinary power of coal, oil and gas". Watson, an author and former speechwriter for prime minister Paul Keating, had a dry take on the same issue. "It's fairly simple to explain," he said. "You do have a problem with the fossil fuel industry. No one wants to take them on. So you don't. That's it." Klein won applause for her rebuke of Australia's policy on asylum seekers and refugees also. Following a discussion of Donald Trump and his plans to build a wall on the border with Mexico, she said pointedly: "I think that Donald Trump talking about building the wall with Mexico is insane and racist. But I think what Australia is doing on Manus and Nauru is as well." Klein said: "I think it's outrageous. The New York Times called this proposal cruel, short-sighted and shameful. I hear this, I hear this argument that it's 'We can't send a message to the people smugglers'. What about the message you're sending to refugees around the world? What message are you sending about Australia? And the implication that the only way people die is at sea. They die in war zones when they can't flee. That's why we welcome refugees."

MORATORIUM ON CRUDE OIL TANKER TRAFFIC COMING SOON: GARNEAU

Federal Liberal cabinet to render a decision on Kinder Morgan by Dec. 19.

Federal Transportation Minister Marc Garneau is promising a moratorium on crude oil tanker traffic off British Columbia's North Coast by the end of this year, which would coincide with the government's cabinet decision on the Kinder Morgan Trans Mountain pipeline expansion project. "That is a promise that we made. It's a mandate item for me and we are going to be delivering on that," Garneau told host Chris Hall in an interview airing on CBC Radio's The House on Saturday morning. Trudeau ordered a moratorium more than a year ago in his mandate letter to Garneau. The directive asks Garneau to work with the ministers of fisheries and oceans, environment and natural resources. Environmental groups have suggested a moratorium off B.C.'s North Coast would kill the proposed Northern Gateway pipeline, which would carry bitumen from Alberta to Kitimat, B.C. The project is still recovering from a blow delivered by the Federal Court of Appeal, which overturned Enbridge's approval because it found Ottawa failed to properly consult the First Nations affected by the pipeline. However, a moratorium could clear the path for the Kinder Morgan project, which could see the transmission of nearly 900,000 barrels a day of diluted oilsands bitumen to Vancouver's harbour in the south. Former Kitimat mayor Joanne Monaghan has questioned why a ban would only apply to the northern coast. "Is there a difference between crude oil being spilled down south and crude oil being spilled in the north?" she said. Trudeau's government needs to render a decision on Kinder Morgan by Dec. 19.

Garneau said he'll also soon have an announcement on improving marine safety.

"We know we need to if we're going to continue having more shipping traffic," he said. "On the West Coast, we want to involve Aboriginal coastal nations who want to be involved with the whole issue of marine safety. We also need to look at derelict vessels."

Garneau's comments came on the heels of a speech this week unveiling the government's transportation plans for the coming decade. The plan responded to a review conducted by former minister David Emerson, who included privatizing airports among his recommendations. Garneau says the government is looking at that option, but "it's not a front-burner exercise." "I wouldn't jump to any conclusions," Garneau told The House. "Ultimately what we want to do is make sure that whatever we do is in the interest of the traveller, is in the interest of the airports and the airlines themselves." Garneau said he's aware of private airports, but nothing stands out as a successful model.
